A NEW EDITOR AT THE HELM

Mrs. George Beattie succumbed to Heart Trouble.

Stricken down by the cold hand of Death, Mrs. George Beattie, who only yesterday was among us, apparently in good health, today lies in silent sleep.

The community was greatly shocked, shortly after the noon hour Wednesday, to learn that Mrs. Beattie had succumbed to heart failure. She had been the guest of Rev. and Mrs. Clydesdale at dinner, and had been chatting and enjoying the occasion. Of a sudden, she complained that she felt dizzy, and in a few moments she had passed to the great beyond.

She is survived by a husband and one son. The family has lived in this community for the past three years, the husband being in business here until just recently. At present Mr. Beattie is on a business trip to Saskatchewan and as yet, all efforts to locate him definitely have failed.

The body was taken this morning to Medicine Hat, and there interment will be made.

Numerous complaints have been made to the town council regarding the cattle running in the streets. The cattle take care of your cattle or pay the fine. —By order of Council.

J. H. Boyer's, World-famous Fashion Plate Dixieland Minstrels, were here Tuesday. Their nondenounced concert templed a large number out into Uncle Sol's sunshiny rays, and 'twas well worth it. The band played a number of selections, after marching around our public square. Among the selections were several plantation melodies that lighted the toes of a couple of dancing girls, who threatened to have a larger crowd of spectators than the showmen themselves. Along with the band were a real 718 southern mammy and grandpa who smoked their cigarettes as unconcernedly as though the rate of the thousands was not open.

Their show in the evening was largely attended, practically the entire population being present. It was a fine entertainment.

Eachman Circus Coming.

On another page you will find the ad of the Eachman Circus, which is to be here on Saturday for two performances. This is a fine time we understand, and undoubtedly will draw a large crowd. There are to be performances both afternoon and evening, rain or shine. There is to be a fine attraction at the show grounds preceding each performance.

Miss A. Shortill, for the past year teacher of the Club school, left last evening for Winnipeg, from where she will continue to her home in Toronto. The school board, Wm. Colman, Murdoch McKenzie and D. A. Leitch, have secured a Miss Reid, also of Ontario, to be in charge of the school, to open in September.

Perhaps you know of someone who is not a subscriber to this paper. If so would you kindly send in their names to us.

Here's Farmer Who Believes in Mixed Farming.

Wm. George, who has a home about fifteen miles north, was in the office Tuesday to subscribe for the paper, and we had quite a little chat with him. He tells us that his crops look fine. Oats are nearly four feet tall and will run over 50 bushels to the acre and his flax, which is about twenty inches tall, promises to go at least 38 bushels. He remarked, however, that he is going to go in more for mixed farming and raise stock and poultry, as well as grain. This, he says, will do away with total failures in dry years. After all, this is what the farmers of the community must do, sooner or later, if they don't want to be at the mercy of the weather man and his jealousy toward water supply. Isn't that true?

Special Notice.

Numerous complaints have been made to the town council regarding the cattle running in the streets. The cattle take care of your cattle or pay the fine. —By order of Council.

H. W. Feige, of Winnipeg, was a business visitor in our busy burg Monday.

Calvin Goss, Proprietor of "The Progress," Retires. The "News" is Now Name of Your Paper.

With this issue of "Progress" the and growing something better by business passes into other hands, and by Calvin Goss.

Herbert S. Ketchum, a young man from Illinois, a printer of experience from change of the business and the new editor after retiring. Mr. Ketchum is a young man of character and energy and we doubt not will be able to give the people of Carlstadt a paper equally as good if not better than they have had for past six months. The former editor expects to leave at once for a trip through the West and on the coast and will probably locate in British Columbia.

Mr. Ketchum has been employed the past month on the Bassano News and took charge of the business here on Monday. In this connection the editor of "Progress" likes to thank the people of Carlstadt and vicinity for the liberal patronage he has received, and the very pleasant business relations he has had with the people here and looks forward to a continuance of the same to his worthy successor. If the people stand by the new proprietor, the retiring editor has faith to believe the paper will continue to be a success.

The new management of the paper enters upon the new duties with a feeling of pleasure for the acquaintances already made; and of inestimable pride in this coming city so splendidly situated in the fertile homestead country. We plan to give to the people of the community in particular, and to the world in general, a newspaper to which you can point with pride a worthy representative of your enterprising business houses and prosperous community—in other words, a means to BOOST CARLSTADT AND THE ENTIRE COMMUNITY.

Believing that you appreciate the fact that a newspaper is a mirror to reflect the town's image; and that it is to your interest to have the tale of the coming development of Carlstadt told abroad, we are fully confident that you will give us the support necessary.

Herbert Ketchum.

JUDKINS OF PULLTIGHT

An Original Story

By Calvin Goss

Synopsis of Story—Joshua Judkins, a country greenhorn, makes good writing up the exposition. He is employed as a regular reporter on the staff of the Bugle. He meets Edith Hoskins and makes a visit to her home. Joshua has many adventures but always comes out on top.

It was a revelation to the young reporter yet untouched by the city's inquiries. Here was a world that he never before had invaded. It was a long step toward the primitive life—not the life of primitive innocence but of primitive cunning and debauchery. Villainy was stamped unmercifully in many a male countenance that he saw in the gathering of that festive occasion, and wantonness and sensual indulgence in the face of many a dusky damsel. Joshua had never been in a place like this before. He had often been urged by "Gauzy" to accompany that young man on midnight excursions in the slum districts, but he had virtuously and steadfastly refused, preferring to remain in ignorance of these wiles of a great city, and then had Joshua shown his strength. But tonight he looked into the depths of the dirty life of the slums, and the distorted face of Bacchus looked at him from the depths.

The establishment of "Hogfoot" on the river front, where steamboats lay at anchor and where during the busy hours of the day big wagons rumbled up over the cobblestones and laughter, oath, jests and bits of song floated up from the negro dock, hands and roustabouts at their labors. "Hogfoot's" mansion stood on piles, underneath it a reeking pool of water backed in from the river and at most seasons of the year covered with a sickly green scum. The interior of "Hogfoot's" palace was not alluring. There were dark recesses, cobwebbed passages, dingy rooms that invited imagination to connect them with motto excesses, orgies and crimes in the past. On this festive night there had been some show at decorative work and those who took part in the "cake walk" were gay in negro finery. Their bodily movements in the "cake walk," many of them of sinuous grace and the poetry of motion, were a revelation to Joshua. The grand march was unlike anything he had ever seen. The deference and politeness shown by the many black hands downy, dusky partners was superior to anything he had ever witnessed. And the feast in the big dining room, gay as a peacock in all its attirements. The food was substantial and well cooked and the hospitality of "Hogfoot" and his family ministered.

"Dynes was there, the right-hand man of Cyril Young, and early in the evening both young men showed unmistakable signs of intoxication. They were on terms of intimacy with some of the dusky damsels, drinking with at the bar, and this was particularly disgusting to this young man, not yet contaminated by the tales of wine, women and the world. Once or twice, Dynes spoke to Judkins in a patronizing way, for he was in high good humor and he finally insisted that Joshua step up to the bar and drink with him. Joshua declined, Dynes still insisted and Young added his own pleading to "have something" with them. At last when Dynes saw further instances of uselessness he whispered something in the ear of Cyril Young. Immediately the face of the young latter, who was concerned, turned pale. "What is it?" he asked. "Joshua! How his heart bounded with disappointment, rage and other feelings. "I can't tell you," he said, "the meaning in the face of the young man, and putting his hand on Joshua's shoulder, beckoned him to a young man to another part of the room. As he did so, he turned in time to note a meeting of once exchanged between Cyril Young and negro bully known as Pete Brown, the "pig terror of Hell's Half Acre." Dunham knew what those glances meant. He was safe at night, and as soon as he could do so without exciting suspicion he left the room with Joshua. "I will see you safely home," said Dunham.

"I know not what may be the end of Cyril Young's coming toward you, but it is evident that he means you harm. You had better keep away from that neighborhood in the future, and if you should need my help or the protection of the police in any way in the future do not fail to call upon me." "Thank you, Mr. Sergeant," Joshua was saying, when, sinking down a dark alley away from them he caught sight of the negro bully and called the officer's attention. "Yes, that's him," said Dunham. "I will lay my men to keep a close watch on that fellow. You are a model young man, I hope. You are a millionaire, I hope." "Yes, I am a millionaire," said Cyril Young will bear a little bit longer," he added. "I am a millionaire."

Next morning the Crescent contained a gloomy account of the murder of "Hogfoot" John and the initiated would have thought from reading it that this negro politician was not only a most influential man but that his "place" was a way proper mansion on Fifth avenue or somewhere among the great tenements.

Young was Cyril Young's political organ, in fact, that he was a stock and was in a position to dictate his policy. Joshua did not write the affair up for the Bugle. He had not attended it in his capacity of a reporter but merely as the guest of Sergeant Dunham, and hastened to deeply about the moral economy of the "Hogfoot" function to be able to describe it in temperate language. The next day Joshua sought the beauty and quiet of the park for a breathing spell and for the opportunity to collect his thoughts. Since he began almost a year before to write his exposition articles in this park he had found it a convenient and desirable place to go for the purpose of calling up the past and making plans for the future. Today he was thinking a good deal of Edith Hoskins. He had not yet known her since he returned from this old home. He did not yet know who the young millionaire was who aspired to win her hand in marriage, and he did not really care to know all he wished to know was that Miss Hoskins was happy and was not being annoyed by her former suitor. He was lost in reverie when he heard the siren of an automobile and looking up he saw only a few yards away, on the boulevard that skirted one side of the park, a big white steamer with a young man at the wheel and a young woman in his arms. He recized them both at once. Edith Hoskins and Cyril Young! How his heart bounded with a dusky sanguine. And here he was amid a multitude of wealth if not refinement, and no doubt pouring out his sentimental nathings to the ears of a pure and sensible girl. "Oh, the horror of it! No wonder she had run away to escape marriage with this wealthy but worthless scion of an old family. But why was she with him now? How had this change in her attitude toward the man she ran away from been brought about?" When Joshua thought of the morning he had talked with Edith Hoskins down among the Knights of Indians, and of the story he had told him, he found it hard to believe that she was anything but a pure and sensible girl, and—whatever the occasion of her now being in the company of Cyril Young, he felt that she had not changed in her feelings toward that young man. There was some excuse for her being in the automobile with Young but he could not fathom it. While in this perturbed state of mind and walking slowly along on the gravel paths of the park he came face to face with Dynes. "You just passed me a minute ago. Guess you saw me?"

"I may be a greenhorn, Mr. Dynes, but I am neither a drunkard nor a bum. I do not drink, not even with a future congressman."

"Oh, you are a model young man, you are; but let me donate you a piece of advice. When in Rome, do as the Romans do."

"I suppose that me us when I am among blackguards and things. I must be one of them. Get your ticket for another guess. Your young millionaire may be a congressman some day but he will never be a gentleman, he is on the wrong road."

"He is no better in my eyes than Pete the negro thug whom he expects to do his dirty work, and as you are a friend of his you may tell him so for me."

Dynes was so enraged that he would have forestalled Pete and struck Joshua, but the park policeman was drawing near and he dared not. Instead, he turned on his heel and through his clenched teeth said:

"Beware, you will not long have a job on the Bugle."

"Oh, I don't know," answered Joshua, "you have tried to secure my dismissal but you failed. I am ambitious; who knows, maybe I'll be managing editor yet, while you are still a reporter—but on some other paper, I hope." "You fool! shouted Dynes, and was gone.

Colonel Hoskins was a master of finance in the city. He was connected with a number of business enterprises, and in some of these he was the moving spirit. He made his wealth and his influence felt on the Board of Trade, and these financial schemes in which he was interested prospered. But he was by no means a popular man. His business dealings had too much about them of the car, and his schemes had crushed too many struggling men and concern for their author to be held in high esteem. But his power was recognized by other masters of finance, and in many instances his advice and help were asked by companies and corporations in which he had no interest in the furtharance of their financial schemes. In that sumptuous office suite of his on Fifth avenue many of the really gigantic enterprises of city, state and nation saw their inception and final fruition. Hoskins was not a politician in the general acceptance of that term; but covertly he had made political moves that had debouched the body politic. Cyril Young was his protege, yes, in most things his counterpart who had grown up under his tutelage and had prospered in all his financial schemes. He now aspired to political honor and Colonel Hoskins was engaged in furthering those schemes, not because he thought Young was especially fitted for a political career but because he was whom the master of finance could use in that capacity to put through certain bills that bore on certain financial schemes in which Colonel Hoskins was interested. And Cyril Young had been assisted by the father in seeking an alliance with his daughter, not because the young man was in any way worthy of the love of a virtuous woman but solely because he was rich and had ambition. Colonel Hoskins knew that Cyril Young was dissolute and untrustworthy, but those faults in his eyes were not to be considered as outweighing the advantages of money.

The political fight in the Ninth Congressional district had grown very warm and the Bugle had championed the cause of Cyril Young's opponent, Andrew Gardner, a struggling young lawyer of excellent attainments and reputation who had just begun to rise into prominence in his profession and who was handicapped by no bad habits and fettered by no alliance. #### CARLSTADT WINS, 12-8

Defeats Dixie Minstrels' Base Ball Team, Tuesday.

In the presence of a large number of spectators, the Carlstadt Regulars defeated the Dixie Minstrels in a ball game here Tuesday afternoon. It was some game—marked by heavy hitting, wild playing, and still more wild umpiring at the start of the game. Bill Cheley appointed himself a committee of one to be Honorable Umpire, and play began, with Carlstadt at bat. Nothing especially interesting happened in the first few innings except that Umpire evidently was afraid that Carlstadt was going to get beaten, and tried to help, too. He finally grew so rank that he was discarded to the side lines, and a brand new umpire, Mr. McNab, was hired. Carlstadt scored one in the second inning, six in the third and five in the fourth, making a total of 12, while the base ball "doods" could only score 8 runs. The lineup was:

Lakin, c.
Swartz, p.
Kautson, s.s.
Flannery, s.a.
Brenner, 1b-p.
Smitsler, 3b.

NOTES OF THE GAME.

The "col'd'ul" rooters were there when it came to cheering.

Stanley pitched superb ball during the first time he worked, but and failed to have town in lower level, as was the case batter that can deliver the goods. Did you ever see John Harley come to compete in a game before?

The large crowd in attendance took a lively interest in the game here.

Good earnest practise for a time would give Carlstadt a winning team.

Say, what's the matter with a game between the Bachelors and the Brides.
